CITYSCAPES

This is a PICTORIAL HISTORY, not a written one. So you should "read" these glimpses with a THIRD EYE for the evidences of pictures. For this you obviously need the PHOTOGRAPHERS, and they deserve much more thanks than they're getting. But contrary to the early-century Webster & Stevens claim (in glimpse #2) none of them took "anything, any time, anywhere." Their subjects and techniques were usually as conventional as their invoices. But still the image of two men intently bulling belly-to-belly before a window display stuffed with historical photographs (glimpse #3) although candidly conventional - like almost any snapshot from a reconnoitering Kodak - is also a CITYSCAPE clamoring with connotations about the ways suited-up citymen talk and the ways citywindows do, too. All of these 294 GLIMPSES are like that, if you take the care to read them so.

These mere conventional photographs actually articulate the TOPOGRAPHY of the City with the kind of lavish interpretation the phrenologist Professor Douglas must have given the bumps on his subjects' heads while "reading" their characters (#4).

So may there be a bump in the middle of your forehead - a kind of special SEATTLE OPTICS - for reading and re-reading these vital evidences of your City's past. These are the spex you need.

Sammis 1865 portrait of this City's FIRST NEIGHBOR has him sitting with his eyes closed and hands comfortably folded high in his lap. Like his namesake city, this photo has received hundreds of retouchings - eyes opened and closed.

THE FIRST NEIGHBORHOOD

The intersection of First (called Commercial then) and Main was both the site of the town's first small business - Doc Maynard's store in 1852 - and later the spot from which Sammis, the town's first resident photographer took its first panorama in 1865.

From the evidence of these pictures PIONEER SQUARE through its several transformations would seem to be something of a male reserve. All those grand style stone structures that were built in the mid-80's were gutted on June 6, 1889. The "phoenix" that resurrected from those ashes included the Seattle Hotel and eventually a stolen totem pole. Today we have a copy of the totem and a "sinking-ship" garage.

GLIMPSES #62 & 65 were taken by F. Jay Hayes, the N.P.'s official photographer on his visit to the Sound in 1890. The RR had finally capitulated in its struggle with Seattle and was offering Seattle - as it always had with Tacoma when it could - those wonderfully fine and fast trains and times. Soon enough Seattle would have five transcontinentals terminating here. They would help swell the city's post-fire population of about forty thousand to two hundred thousand only twenty years later - and that's a handful of new neighborhoods.

The FIRE of June 6th, 1889 destroyed a few score of city-blocks, many a fortune - but also built many an opportunity - an estimated thirty thousand rats and probably as many negatives and prints. Many of these were of CITYSCAPES; so in this sense the city was destroyed many times over.

so that the outfitters could sell supplies on the sidewalks. Some of the hard scenes around Pioneer Square made the hearts of first hill matrons faint for their children. So the family stayed pretty much up on the hill - anyway, the view was pretty good from up there - while the family men were down below selling "portable" cast-iron stoves to these "travelling men." But it would seem that Mr. Butterworth's suggestion appealed to a different sense of "passing through" than these men had in mind.

Most of the street car lines were constructed in the late '80's and '90's to feed real estate speculations with both the new arrivals on the RR and those fleeing the urban congestion these immigrants helped cause. Many lines also terminated at or made stops along the way at natural retreats like Woodland and Ravenna Parks or recreational parks like Leschi & Madison.

UNIVERSITY DISTRICT

When the UW moved from the original Denny donation to its present location, the first structure was an imposing one: Denny Hall. In 1896 the view to the SW from its bell tower revealed a bleak landscape of clearcutting. It would be decades before the urban garden of leafy trees would reach the rooflines of the clapboards, and today, except in winter, we can only see the higher concrete condos, for the verdure is often higher than the houses.

THIRD AVE. ITS UPS AND DOWNS

THIRD AVE. was the only north-south street that was actually interrupted by DENNY HILL (cf #176). The street stopped a little north of Pine (#158) and began again at Virginia (#159, a rare detail of the neighborhood.) Sighting down the center of 3rd in the '90's the imagination was triggered by what filled the gap: the gothic presence of the Denny Hotel. Built in 1890 its interior was only appointed years later, in 1903, for its opening as the Washington Hotel (cf #173). Thus, besides being monumental, it was also empty and wraithlike throughout the '90's. (Perhaps this uncanny attitude held on and helped sedate objections to its eventual leveling in 1906.) But from the evidence of our Glimpse #158 the view from its balconies down 3rd was a most pleasing prospect: at once pastoral and urbane.

THE DENNY REGRADE: FIRST AND SECOND

In the primitive pano-rama below (#166) there rises a natural anomaly that interrupts those striations that make an urban grid out of a forested hill. That topographical insurrec-tion is DENNY HILL. It is rendered here by an artist with an obvious affection more for ships than for the lay of the land. From the evi-dence of this panorama alone one might have predicted that one day that little bump would have to go. And so it went. FIRST AVE. graded in 1899 from Pike to Den-ny. While easing the strain on the horsepower, this re-grading seriously stalled drainage (#161) SECOND AVE, followed from 1903 to 1906 at the same time the Great Northern was tunneling under the city (#169). From Pike to Battery the humps at Stewart and Lenora (#171 & 168) were leveled (#172).

WHERE THE ENGINEERS WERE BLOCKED

Upper Second Avenue before it was regraded; from Lenora Street, in the foreground, a steep hill down to Virginia Street, then another steep hill up to Stewart Street. Virginia, where you see the horses and wagons, was the low point in the avenue. The engineers wanted to grade Second Avenue down virtually to a level from Pine Street north to Battery Street, but the old Washington Hotel, seen at the left, blocked that plan and forced the city to leave the Virginia Street corner untouched, as this was the carriage route to the hotel.

Even though business was steady in this "Scenic Hotel of the World" by 1906, only 3 years after it opened to T.R., the owner, James Moore, had been convinced by City Engineer, R.H. Thompson, that a New Washington would be worth sacrificing the old. That opened the floodwaters and by 1911 all of the Hill east to 5th Ave. was flushed away: a neighborhood of low-income housing and the natural resource of a rolling landscape was leveled.

When Arthur "Link" Lingenbrink graduated from Seattle-Hi in 1913 as a young man of "...noble deed" he ventured into commercial art, and his early talent for the art of window display is exhibited below in the Bon Marche window from 1915, and on the following page in the windows of Douglas and Berg. In 1919 Link started his own sign co. and soon his brother Paul joined him. Recently, Dunn and Bradstreet announced that the Lingenbrinks had broken the record for two brothers being in the same line of business in the same city and the same neighborhood. Obviously they still hold it. 294 GLIMPSES is dedicated to them.

U. S. OFFICERS TO DISCUSS STRIKE
The Seattle Star
FINAL EDITION

STOP BEFORE IT'S TOO LATE

This is plain talk to the common-sense union men of Seattle. You are being rushed pell-mell into a general strike, which you have never before--which, in fact, has never been used anywhere in the United States--that are sure to come from before--which, in fact, has never been used anywhere in the United States. It isn't too late to avert the tragic results that are sure to come from before--which, in fact, has never been used anywhere in the United States. You men know better than any one else that public sentiment is that is, the sentiment of the ninety per cent of the people who directly involved in the wage dispute of the shipworkers--is again strike. You know that the general public doesn't think the situation of that drastic, disaster-breeding move. You know, too, that and you know, too, that no strike has ever been used.

HOOVERVILLE:

A Neighborhood of Necessity

The HOOVERVILLES of the Great Depression were Neighborhoods of Necessity: unemployed men, mostly, organized around the basic need to survive. THE SEATTLE GENERAL STRIKE of 1919 was different. Theirs was a desire for greater control over the means and ends of their work...while they had it. Soon enough - with the post-war depression - they did not.

A NEIGHBORHOOD OF CAMOUFLAGE

During WWII the BOEING Flying Fortress plant on the Duwamish was big enough to support an entire neighborhood on its roof. Today that may seem absurd that such camouflage would have fooled anyone, but perhaps it was another symptom of that anxious fear and paranoia that sent the entire citizenry of Japanese descent into internment for the duration of the war. (#214). That roof was also a strong symbol for the dangerous switch in the defensive posture of all modern cities from one of fortress to one of target. Now in the nuclear age even much more than in 1942, Seattle has come a long way from its blockhouse (#283).

(291-U) Potlatch Parade down 5th Avenue in Regrade ca. 1915

In 1916, after 20 years of consulting faces in Seattle, the Physiognomist Prof. Douglas claimed to have read the heads of "over 50,000 pleased customers." Perhaps through our GLIMPSES the face of the City might be read as if its historical topography were like bumps on its forehead and lines about its eyes. Such a reading requires not only observing the rules of historical evidence but also those of imagination. So we discover and perhaps feel through these pictures how our neighborhoods were once communities, and that in such a setting being a proprietor meant that beyond selling something to a customer you also gave him or her your neighborly concern. NEIGHBORHOOD BUSINESS WEEK is a contemporary opportunity to share this concern. As a celebration these weekends

CX, ARGUS & DELLA

This space is reserved for giving special thanks to CX CORPORATION, ARGUS NEWSPAPER and DELLA STREET.

CX CORPORATION started in 1968 as seven employees processing Kodacolor film for local snapshooters. Now in their new plant in Rainier Valley, the seven have multiplied to over nine hundred. CX is an example of a small business that grew big fast but still keeps links with its neighborhood. Many of its employees live in the valley.

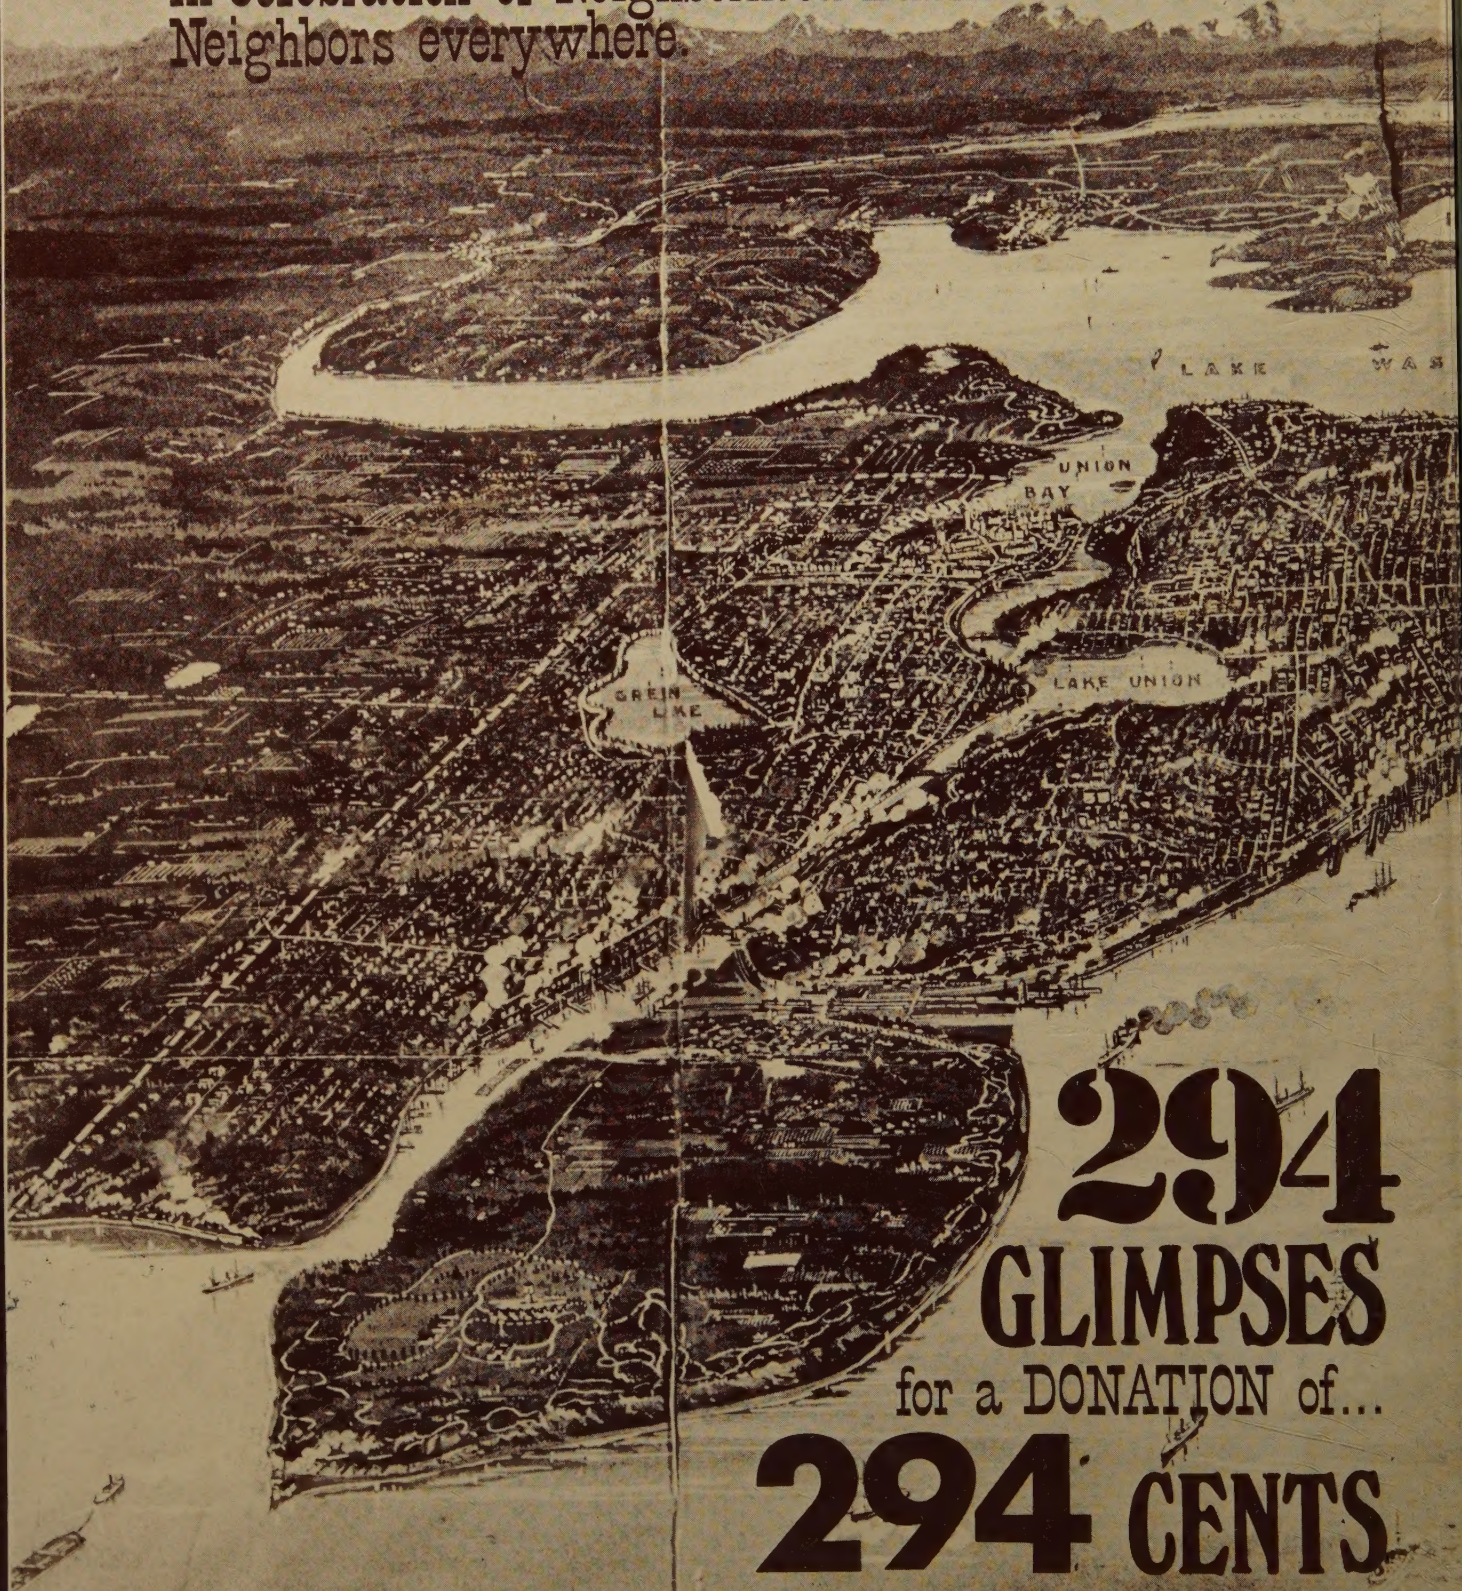

ARGUS has been around since 1894 when it began publishing as a weekly. It still does. (Image #97 in these pages was taken from the ARGUS 1894 Christmas Edition.)

DELLA STREET is a secretarial service whose three employees will soon be celebrating their fifth anniversary in business.

THANKS to CX for providing the financial seed to begin this publication... THANKS to ARGUS and its publisher, MURRAY PUBLISHING, for encouraging its publication with tender care and a healthy cut in publishing costs ... and THANKS to DELLA STREET for graciously donating all the publication's typographics.
